Pinabaga's brothers were less fortunate. They were illiterate and with their large families they had to work the family farm. One day while the brothers were at work, they heard someone singing a love song and upon their return to the farm they discovered Pinabaga and his friends dancing and singing. Their faces were painted with flowers and their bodies were decorated with red and white lilies. Their songs were filled with love and passion. In amazement the brothers told Mother, who ordered her family to leave for the city the following day. They travelled by foot, for the easiest way to travel was on foot. Several days later, the family arrived at a busy port where the bride was delivered to her new family. The family was not well off. With little room to spare, the house was dirty and unpleasant to live in. There was only one bathroom that served many rooms. There was one room where the family stayed for the most part, and that was the kitchen. Only the mothers and the brothers and sisters slept in the house. As a wedding gift, the bride was given a large trunk with a key to lock it and also a safe for her personal belongings. She locked the key in the trunk and locked it in the safe. On the wedding day, she took out the key, opened the trunk and placed it on a small table. She had not given the key to her bridegroom, she told her family. The bridegroom had been taken to a different home. At that moment she knew that her new husband could not have loved her as much as she did him. So she locked the key in the trunk and in the safe. Her life was not easy. Her husband was hardly ever at home. He was working in another town for long hours every day. He was a manager at a construction site. The salary he received was very small, yet he always had money for the family. One day, Pinabaga, who was called by his name, told his family, "I have a dream that I will have a large enough property. I can build a beautiful home with a roof and many windows. I want a girl like you and other family members. She will be just like me, beautiful and attractive to all people." At the time Pinabaga was working in another town, he was traveling with friends. On their way they passed by a small town. They stopped at a shop for refreshments. They were having $215746af
